21. To strain at: to make a difficulty of 'swallowing' or accepting (something); to scruple at. Also (rarely), †to strain to do something.

This use is due to misunderstanding of the phrase 'strain at a gnat' in Matt. xxiii. 24. It has been asserted that 'straine at' in the Bible of 1611 is a misprint for 'straine out', the rendering of earlier versions (see 14 e). But quots. 1583 and 1594 show that the translators of 1611 simply adopted a rendering that had already obtained currency. It was not a mistranslation, the meaning intended being 'which a rain the liquor if they find a gnat in it'. The phrase, however, was early misapprehended (perh. already by Shaks. in quot. 1609), the verb being supposed to mean 'to make violent effort' (see sense 18).

Stratus (strē·tŭs). Meteorol. [a. L. stratus (n stem), f. strā-, sternĕre to spread, lay down. (See quot. 1803, and cf. STRATUM.)] One of the simple forms of cloud, having the appearance of a broad sheet of nearly uniform thickness, usually existing at low elevations.

1803 L. HOWARD Modif. Clouds (1865) 4 Stratus, a widely extended, continuous, horizontal sheet, increasing from below upward. Contin. This application of the Latin word stratus is a little forced. But the substantive stratum, did not agree in its termination with the other two [cirrus, cumulus], and is besides already used in a different sense even on this subject, e.g. a stratum of clouds; yet it was desirable to keep the derivation from the verb sterno, as its significations agree so well with the circumstances of this Cloud. 1831 HARWEIER Nat. Magic vi. (1833) 141 A thin stratus or 'fog bank' appeared in the same quarter. 1858 JENYNS Observ. Meteorol. 199 Hence a mist will often appear in damp places, while in others, where dews are of constant occurrence, a mist, i.e. stratus, may be a rare thing. 1868 PIDGEON Engineer's Holiday II. 216 Extending..a considerable distance towards the zenith, lay a thick horizontal layer of stratus, above which was blue.

attrib. 1860 TYNDALL Glac. I. xviii. 122 A gray stratus cloud had drawn itself across the neck of the Matterhorn. 1883 Harper's Mag. May 888/2 In that low mass of stratus clouds which overhung the sunset there was now a wild convulsion.

2. Phrases. a. To make bricks without straw: said with allusion to Exodus v.

The current form and application of the saying are hardly justified by the narrative. The Israelites were not required to make bricks without straw (which was an indispensable binding material for sun-dried bricks), but to gather the straw for themselves instead of having it furnished to them. The phrase, however, now commonly means 'to be required) to produce results without the means usually considered necessary'. Cf. the accurate use in quot. 1661.

1658 in Verney Mem. (1907) II. 79 It is an hard task to make bricks without straw. 1661 DR. ORMONDE in 11th Rep. Hist. MSS. Comm. App. v. 10 If they will not let that [act] passe..and yet will have us keepe armys, is it not requiring a tale of bricks, without allowing the straw. 1874 L. STEPHEN Hours in Library I. vi. 272 It is often good for us to have to make bricks without straw. 1883 MISS M. BETHAM-EDWARDS Disinvited I. I. 5 The fact is, you are fast being spoiled. But your task from to-day will be to make bricks without straw. No appeal shall induce me to have pity on you.

b. In the straw: in childbed, lying-in. So out of the straw, recovered after childbearing.

In quot. 1786 the phrase is taken to refer to the practice of laying down straw (to deaden noise) before a house where there is a confinement. It is doubtful whether this was the original meaning, though the practice was common.

b. With prefixed word, forming the proper name of a street. Abbreviated St., st.

In early examples these appellations were originally descriptive, as in the Broad street, the High street. (In some towns, a name of this type still retains the definite article.) In modern nomenclature, the choice of the prefixed word is often arbitrary.

Modern usage is divided as to the writing of these names with hyphen or as two words. (In the 16–17th c. they were not unfrequently written as one word, e.g. 'Limestreete', Stow Surv. ed. 1603, p. 152.) It is to be observed that names ending in street are always stressed on the prefixed element, while those ending in road or lane have level stress: cf., e.g., Park-street with Park-lane, Park-road.

1855 W. J. M. Rankine Misc. Sci. Papers (1881) 120 In this paper, the word 'Strain' will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces; and the word 'Stress' will be used to denote the force, or combination of forces, which such a molecule exerts in tending to recover its free condition, and which, for a state of equilibrium, is equal and opposite to the combination of external forces applied to it. 1856 Thomson in Phil. Trans. CXLVI. 481 A stress is an equilibrating application of force to a body. Ibid. note, It will be seen that I have deviated slightly from Mr. Rankine's definition of the word 'stress,' as I have applied it to the direct action experienced by a body from the matter around it, and not, as proposed by him, to the elastic reaction of the body equal and opposite to that action. 1873 R. H. Bow Economics of Construction 45 note, The term stress expresses the condition of a part of the structure to the extremities of which are applied compressing or extending forces; the amount of the stress is measured by the magnitude of the force acting on either extremity; the strain is the change of length from elasticity which the part undergoes when subjected to the stress. 1873 Maxwell Electr. & Magn. I. 59 The nature of this stress [in dielectrics] is, a tension along the lines of force combined with an equal pressure in all directions at right angles to these lines. 1896 Greener Gun (ed. 6) 545 The stresses upon a gun are a radial stress or 'pressure'; a tangential stress, or hoop tension..; a longitudinal stress. 1911 J. The OE. forms representing the orig. Teut. conjugation are: strēgan*, etc. (see STRAY v.[4]) = Goth. straujan, and pa. t. stǣwede = Goth. strawida. The original pres.-stem in OE. (as in some other Teut. langs.) was superseded by a new-formation after the pa. t. Owing to the influence of the following w, the umlaut-ǣ became diphthongized, producing the forms streow-, streaw-. The OE. forms with ǣ or falling diphthong are represented by the α forms above, while strew- pronounced with a rising diphthong gave rise to the β forms. According to modern usage, the two spellings correspond to the two pronunciations; formerly, the spelling strew was often used where the rime was a word like so, and conversely strow riming with new etc.

The rare γ forms stroyte are app. borrowed from or influenced by Du. strooien.

The pa. pple. is now most commonly strewn or strown in passive tenses, esp. where there is no distinct reference to an agent; and strewed, strowed in active tenses.]

Stride (straid), v. Pa. t. strode (strōud), pa. pple. stridden (strid'n). Forms: 1 stridan, 3 striden, 4 strid, (3rd pers. sing. strit), 4–6 stryd(e, 5 strydyn, 4– stride. Pa. t. 4–9 north. strade, 5 Sc. straid, 5, 7 strad, 6 Sc. straide, 6 stryd, 7 strid, 7–9 strided, 5– strode. Pa. pple. 6 stridde, 7 strid, 9– stridden. [OE. stridan str. vb. (once only, but cf. bestridan, found once in pa. t. bestrād: see BESTRIDE v.) = (M)LG. strīden str. vb., to set the legs wide apart, straddle, to take long steps; cf. LG. bestriaen to bestride (a horse). The vb. is not found elsewhere in Teut. with similar sense, but is formally coincident and prob. identical with the str. vb. meaning to strive, quarrel: OFris. strīda, (M)Du. strijden, MLG. strīden, OHG. strītan (MHG. strīten, mod.G. streiten); of the same or similar meaning are the weak verbs, OS. strīdian (MLG. strīden), ON. strīða (Norw., Sw. strida; Da. stride is now conjugated strong); cf. OFris., OS. strīd, Du. strijd, OHG. strīt (mod.G. streit) masc. strife, quarrel, ON. strīð neut. strife, grief, affliction (Norw., Sw., Da. strid), strīða fem. adversity, severity, strīð-r stubborn, severe (Norw., Sw., Da. strid).

The primary meaning of the Teut. root strīd-* is commonly assumed to be 'contention' or 'strong effort'. On this view the Eng. sense of the vb., 'to take long steps' (sense 2 below), would be a development from the continental sense 'to strive'. This would in itself be possible, but sense 1 would remain unexplained. The assumption of a primary sense 'to diverge' (cf. Skr. srīdh to go astray) would account plausibly on the one hand for the sense 'to quarrel', and on the other hand for the sense 'to straddle', from which the sense 'to take long steps' would be a natural development.

The recent examples show much uncertainty with regard to the conjugation. Perhaps (though this is far from certain) most people would give stride, striddeu in answer to a grammatical question; but in actual speech and writing there is often hesitation as to the correct form. The pa pple. rarely occurs; our material includes hardly any 19th or 20th c. examples of stridden, and not many of strided. In the pa. t. strode is certainly the usual form; but where the reference is to a single act and not to a manner of progression there seems to be a tendency to say strided ('I strided over the ditch').]

†1. intr. To stand or walk with the legs widely diverging; to straddle. Obs. in literal sense: cf. b.

OF. estriver (early mod.F. ôtriver: still preserved in some dialects), to quarrel, contend: of disputed origin.

The verb is not found outside Fr., the alleged Pr. estribar cited by etymologists having no existence. It is commonly believed to be of Teut. etymology. According to some scholars, OF. estriver is f. estrif (whence STRIFE sb.), which is regarded as a modification of the older OF. (and Pr.) estrit, (= OIt. strido, strio), a. OTeut. strīdo-* strife, combat, related to strīdan* to fight: see STRIDE v. According to others, the OF. verb (of which, on this view, the sb. estrif is a derivative) is a. OTeut. stri·ðan* str. vb. (Mid. G. striben, early mod. Du. strijven, though these are prob. of secondary origin), f. root strīð-, of which the ablaut-variant strīð- is represented by the weak verb MLG. streven (mod. LG. strewen), (M)Du. streven, MHG., mod.G streben, to endeavour, struggle (= sense 9 below), also (from LG.) Sw. strāfva, Da. strøbe. Both explanations present some unsolved difficulties; the former is more satisfactory with regard to sense, but the notions of 'conflict' and 'endeavour' easily pass the one into the other.

The strong conjugation (on the analogy of drive etc.) is found somewhat earlier than the weak conjugation which would be normal for a verb adopted from Fr., and has always been the more frequent of the two, though many examples of strived pa. t. and pa. pple. occur in writers of every period from the 14th to the 19th c. The Bible of 1611 has always strove in the pa. t.; the pa. pple. is strived, striven (one example each). The irregular pa. pple. strove (after the pa. t.; cf. the form stroven of the 16–17th c.) appears first in the 17th c., and remained somewhat common down to the middle of the 19th c., but is now confined to illiterate use.]

22. Gram. In various applications (opposed to weak). a. Of Teutonic sbs. and adjs., their inflexions, etc.: Belonging to any of those declensions in which the OTeut. stem ended otherwise than in n. b. Of Teut. verbs and their inflexions: Forming the pa. t. and pa. pple. by means of vowel-gradation in the root-syllable, as the Eng. give, break. Hence occas. used with reference to other Indo-Germanic langs., e.g. in strong aorist, applied in Gr. grammar to the 'second aorist' (ἔλιπον) in contradistinction to the 'weak' or sigmatic aorist (ἔλειψα). c. In Sanskrit grammar, applied to the unreduced form of noun-stems, and to those cases which are formed on the 'strong' stem.

In these uses strong and weak are translations of the G. stark and schwach, the grammatical senses of which are due to Jakob Grimm. The reason for the choice of these terms to denote the two classes of declension was prob. that in German the formal distinction of case is weakened in the n declensions by the disappearance of the original case-endings. (Some scholars, following the letter of Grimm's own definition, inconveniently restrict the term 'strong' to the vocalic stems, so that the stems ending in other consonants than s form a third class, neither 'strong' nor 'weak'.) The ablaut-verbs were designated as 'strong' because in them the form of the root sufficed to express past time without the adventitious aid of a tense-suffix.

a. 1841 Latham Eng. Lang. 58 In A. S...there is the Weak, or Simple Declension for words ending in a Vowel (as Eage, Steorra, Tunga), and the Strong, or Complex Declension for words ending in a Consonant (Smiδ, Spræc, Leaf).

b. 1841 Latham Eng. Lang. 277 The German Grammarians call the Tenses formed by a change of vowel, the Strong Tenses, the Strong Verbs, the Strong Conjugation, or the Strong Order. Ibid. 278 The Strong Præterites are formed from the Present by changing the vowel, as sing, sang, speak, spoke. 1871 Earle Philol. Eng. Tongue § 274 There is a slow continual tendency in these strong verbs to merge themselves gradually into the more numerous class of the weak verbs.

1. In Greek choral and lyric poetry, and imitations of this: A series of lines forming a system the metrical structure of which is repeated in a following system called the Antistrophe. Also, in wider sense, one of two or more metrically corresponding series of lines forming divisions of a lyric poem. Hence occas. Originally the word στροφή, 'turning', was applied to the movement of the chorus from right to left, and ἀντιστροφή, 'counter-turn', to its returning movement from left to right; hence these terms became the designations of the portions of the choric ode sung during these movements respectively

Struggle (strʊ·g'l), v. Forms: 4–5 strogel, 5 strogolyn, strogil (strokel), 6 strog(g)ell, stroggle, 4–6 strogle, strougle, 4–7 strugle, struggel, 6– struggle. [ME. strugle, strogel, etc., a frequentative formation of obscure origin.

According to Skeat the root is that of ON. strig-r, MSw. strugh-er, ill will, Sw. dial. strug, contention, strife, reluctance, strugg, revengeful, Norw. stru, refractory, Da. dial. struende, reluctantly. On this assumption, however, the formation of the ME. verb still requires explanation; there is no evidence of a Scandinavian type struggla.* Others regard the word as cogn. w. Du. struikelen, G. strauchein (MHG. strâchelu, freq. of OHG. strâhhên, -ôn), to stumble. The change from (k) to (g) would not be a strong objection to this etymology, but the meanings of the Eng. and the continental verbs are widely apart. Possibly the word may be due to phonetic symbolism, the beginning being suggested by words like strive, strong; cf. TUGGLE v., TOGGLE v.]
